DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The small two story frame building now in advanced stages of decay appears to have been a two bay wide, two room deep dwelling, like several in the block of George Street. The facade has been re-modeled in recent times with the addition of a one story leanto on the north side. Presently, there is a door in the leanto and one on the opposite side of the facade with a double window between. On the second story is the original fenestration with two windows. Raised seam tin covers the roof which formerly had wood shingles. On the rear of the building is a two story leanto, about the same depth as the main part and traces of a former one story leanto can be discerned on the back. The roof of the rear has collapsed.

If the building were re-constructed on its present lines, it would be an attractive element in the street scape as well as a live-able small dwelling.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Since this building has been greatly altered since it was constructed, it has little architectural merit. It does, however, maintain the continuity of the closely-built dwellings along George Street. More important is the fact that it was used as the telephone exchange at one time.

This is another of the houses built by Thomas Conrey using the products of his mill on the causeway. In 1925, the Masons bought this little house as a home for a member's widow. The house contained one of the early telephone offices for a short time, in the room to the left in front.

The house was originally built right up on the street as were most of the houses in this area. About 1945 Joseph Savin moved the house about twenty feet back from the street, put it over a full basement, and added the lean-to to the living room. The modifications were to make room for the telephone company who used the house for the Chesapeake City telephone exchange for a time.

This house was one of about nine built by Thomas Conrey on lots leased from the Bayards of Philadelphia who owned the farmland on which Chesapeake City was built. These little houses were all nearly alike, some left hand and some right hand. Picture B shows another of these houses in more nearly in original configuration. In restoring our house we have tried to return it to more nearly this earlier configuration.

The back of the house had completely fallen in. Rather than replace the the two story lean-to as shown in the 1975 picture (Picture A), the decision was made to provide more headroom to the back bedroom by providing a peaked roof as can be seen in picture C. This modification was made with the concurrence of the Chesapeake City Historic Commission.

The house is an integral part of one of the main blocks of the historic district and was one of the earliest houses. Unfortunately, after its use by the telephone company in the forties, the house was let go to ruin. The whole back of the house essentially fell into the basement. None of the interior walls were restorable. At the time^{ca. 1945} modification a floor was laid in the front part of the house at 90° to the old floor. (Only the front part of the house was used by the telephone company). When the added floor was removed, happily the old wide board floor was found in restorable condition. It can be seen in the front hall and living room views. The upper floors were in such bad condition that they were carpeted for this rental house, but they were left in place. Of course there were no floors in the back of the house at all.
